“ I first befriended Terrance Mason in 2012 when I temporarily lived in the house of his ex-girlfriend, whose son, Richie, I was very good friends with. Our initial connection as visual artists developed into something much deeper and has continued up to the present year.

However, at the end of the day, even though I encouraged him as much as he did me, it was Terrance who changed my life as a visual artist. This transformation wasn't just due to his encouragement for me to move beyond pen and ink and delve into painting. It was also because he consistently urged me to grow and evolve, especially during times when I was inexperienced.

Coming from a very conservative family where the arts aren't highly appreciated, particularly abstract and unconventional art, which isn't for everyone, I can't overstate the massive impact Terrance had by pushing me to go further. In a way, he assumed a role that one's family would typically play, but mine did not.

The world lost a good soul, but hopefully, we can keep his memory alive in the future as he deserves. He already initiated this with his epic Superman VS Ali painting, which is on permanent rotating display at the Muhammad Ali Museum. I am saddened to lose such a special mentor—unpretentious, generous with time and input, and genuinely desiring to see others flourish. Rest in peace, my friend. I have so much love for all you did for me and others, as it seems to be the case.
